History

Pennsylvania Institute of Health and Technology was established in 1987 by West Virginia Junior College in Morgantown, West Virginia. The Pennsylvania campus was established to provide short-term career-focused training to meet the needs of southwestern Pennsylvanians and their employers.

West Virginia Junior College (then called Morgantown Commercial College) was founded in 1922. Its original emphasis was basic office skills, such as typing, bookkeeping and business writing. Over the years, the College evolved to meet the changing needs of area employers. Today, the campuses offer a variety of short-term career-focused programs in the fields of health, business and technology.

The original Pennsylvania campus was established on US 119 North, approximately a half mile south of its current location. In 1998, the land was acquired at the current campus location and a modern, expanded campus was constructed. The location was carefully selected to provide a quiet, pleasant atmosphere to maximize learning. The campus is designed to meet the needs and demands of a modern learning environment. The main building is tastefully decorated and provides quiet space for student study, a student lounge for students to relax and socialize between classes, and space for other student activities and uses.
